Part 3: Reading comprehension (20%, 2 points for each)

Directions: Read the two reading passages and choose ONE best answer.

David Lehmann and his scientific team finally captured a giant pangolin after a two-week chase in Gabon's rainforests. ■ (A) The pioneering project is a huge step forward to protect the rare mammal. It is hoped that the giant pangolin provides new insights into pangolin species' ecology, helping save the species.

The insect-eating species covered with overlapping scales are considered one of the most threatened groups of mammals in the world for two reasons. First of all, there is a lack of knowledge about pangolins because the species are living in inaccessible places with a solitary and nocturnal lifestyle. This hampered the efforts to research the species. ■ (B) Secondly, the pangolin is hunted for its market value. Pangolin scales are thought to be popular ingredients in Chinese medicine to treat diseases even though there is no scientific proof. Under attack, pangolins roll into a ball and raise their tough scales. ■ (C) The mistaken belief and self-defense posture make pangolins the most heavily trafficked mammal in the world. Lehmann expects to provide governments accurate techniques to stop the poaching of pangolins in the long term. ■ (D)

Procrastination can have a negative impact on modern people's life. It is reported that income of chronic procrastinators tends to be $14,000 less than that of their more productive co-workers. These procrastinators also experience high levels of anxiety, resulting in potential risks of chronic illnesses. Dr. Jason Wessel has prompted four "reflection points" to help reduce procrastination, namely: expectancy, delay sensitivity, value, and metacognition.

The four points encourage people to consider causes of procrastination. The first point, "expectancy," indicates that underestimation of one's ability demotivates people to perform well. The second is "delay sensitivity" in which people may fail to evaluate the negative consequences if a required task is not completed on time. In the third point, "value," people might favor instant pleasure over long-term benefits of accomplishing a task. The final point, "metacognition," emphasizes the analytical process of thinking, which helps people avoid harmful behaviors. Wessel recruited approximately 100 university learners to test the outcomes of the intervention in which the learners were required to reflect on the abovementioned points in the process of completing a writing task. The finding showed that contemplating the reflection points significantly motivated the learners to adapt their behaviors to fulfill tasks although immediate benefits were not proved.

 (B) To share a procrastinator's story. (D) To exemplify a negative effect of procrastination.
43. What does the word "demotivate" in paragraph 2 mean?
 (A) To make someone willing to do a job (C) To encourage people to actively support something
 (B) To make someone less eager to do something (D) To make a plan or wish become true.
44. Which of the following prompts can be used to check the reflection point of "value"?
 (A) How would I feel if I fail to do the task? (C) What is the immediate step I have to take?
 (B) How can I develop the skills I need to complete the task? (D) What could I have done differently?
45. What can be implied about Wessel's research findings?
 (A) It takes time for people to quit the habit of postponing. (C) The reflection points can successfully help people reduce the elevated risk of chronic diseases.
 (B) The university context might not be good to test Wessel's research method. (D) The reflection points sound annoying but practical.
